Immigrant Stories: Ethnicity and Academics in Middle Childhood by Cynthia T. García Coll and Amy Kerivan Marks is a must-read for anyone who does research on child development, who cares for or teaches immigrant children, and who knows immigrant children. Currently, one of five children in the U.S. is either an immigrant child (himself or herself migrated to the U.S. from another country) or a child of immigrant parents. In fewer than 25 years, these children, together with other non ...

In a three year, longitudinal study, Garcia Coll and Kerivan Marks examine the cultural, psychological and academic development of U.S. middle school students from three immigrant groups: Cambodian, Dominican, and Portuguese. These diverse groups living in East Providence, and Providence, Rhode Island represent a cross-section of the current wave of immigration. The authors note that the "immigrant story" in America is often represented as one large story. In contrast,
