What I Saw Reports From Berlin 1920 1933 Joseph Roth

If this is so, consider the elegant and insightful "WHAT I SAW: Reports from Berlin 1920-1933". In the 34 short essays in WHAT I SAW, Joseph Roth purports to take a pointillist's and average-guy perspective on Weimar-era Berlin. As he states in his first essay "Going for a Walk": "It's only the minutiae of life that are important... The diminutive of the parts is more impressive than the monumentality of the whole. I no longer have any use for the sweeping gestures of heroes on the global ...

What I Saw: Reports from Berlin 1920-1933 by Joseph Roth

“What I Saw” is a collection of newspaper articles written by an Austrian-born German journalist, Joseph Roth, which captured perfectly the atmosphere and the spirit of Weimar Berlin. Through these short vignettes, the reader is immersed into a world of immigrants and Bohemians, politicians and crooks, cabaret patrons and journalists, in short, ordinary people living in the most extraordinary, cosmopolitan city of 1920s’ Europe. Roth doesn’t let anything go unnoticed and ...

What I Saw: Reports from Berlin 1920 to 1933 is a translation of an earlier German collection of his essays. (It is hard maybe impossible to know how many pieces he wrote as the Nazis burned as many Jewish and Liberal newspaper archives as they could, along with a lot of the paper's readers and staff.). Michael Hoffman in his very interesting introduction says there are those who know Roth's ...
